Mainstreaming Inclusion Health Practice: Key Communication Pointers for Teaching Undergraduate Medical Students

This session will be led by Dr Austin O'Carroll and Professor Andrea Williamson, both Inclusion Health GPs who teach and train medical students and graduates.

Inclusion Health focuses on providing high quality healthcare to people who are marginalised in society. This includes people experiencing homelessness, problem substance use, people who are migrants and others.

Austin will begin the session by focussing on conversations of exclusion that lead to patients being excluded from services or care.

Andrea will then do a whistle-stop tour of Trauma Informed Practice (TIP) and her experience of teaching TIP to undergraduate medical students with signposting to excellent resources.

There will be plenty time for questions and discussion.

Andrea is Professor of General Practice and Inclusion Health at the University of Glasgow. She is deputy director of GP teaching in MBChB. Her research interests are focussed on missingness in health care. She is a GP in Homeless Health Services and a medic in Alcohol and Drug Recovery Services, Glasgow.

Austin is an inner-city GP since 1997. The focus of his career has been improving access for communities affected by marginalisation or deprivation to quality primary healthcare. He founded several initiatives for the benefit of inclusion health communities in Ireland and has won many awards for his work. He participated in the 2016 Paralympics in sailing.
